Excerpt: . . . five hundred and seventy-five of them burned in the Bengal Presidency; but after the enactment of the law, the number began to decrease. The treaties with the Indian princes contained a clause forbidding it. The custom is really discontinued, though an occasional instance of it comes to light. The dancing had been renewed, and this conversation continued till later. At this wedding Lord Tremlyn met a gentleman whom he introduced to some of his party as Sahib Govind. This gentleman had just invited him to visit a theatrical performance at a private house, such as a European can very rarely witness. I never went to a theatre in my life! protested Mrs. Belgrave. But this is a representation in connection with the religious traditions of the Hindus, argued his lordship. It was decided to go, the scruples of the Methodists being overcome by the fact..
